The types of services he will provide include: (1) psychological assessment of employees for hiring, promotion and development purposes (2) psycho-educational programs on relevant topics such as stress management (3) conflict resolution and mediation (4) group facilitation to address problematic communication or build team cohesiveness and (5) psychological support during organizational transitions (e.g., restructuring, redeployments and layoffs). For each client engagement, the supervisee will manage the consulting process including initial in-person or telephone contact with the client, defining and contracting consulting services to be delivered, performing data collection and analysis, documenting findings and feeding back results, designing and participating in the delivery of interventions, evaluating the effectiveness of interventions, and termination. Throughout the consulting process, the supervisee will establish and maintain an effective, collaborative working relationship with his client and the client organization. Additionally, the consulting services he delivers will be based on the principles of organizational psychology and behavior. Finally, the supervisee will adhere to legal, regulatory and ethics codes guidelines for the practice of Industrial and Organizational (I/O) Psychology.

II. SPE Plan - Goals, Objectives and Professional Socialization

The goals and objectives of the supervised professional experience are to develop the organizational consulting knowledge and skills of the supervisee so that at the conclusion of the psychological assistantship he is sufficiently competent to consult independently in private practice. These goals and objectives will be accomplished, along with his socialization into the profession of I/O psychology, through weekly supervision. Mentoring, teaching, role modeling and consultative guidance will occur in the process of supervision via verbal and written consulting progress reports, detailed review of work products produced by the supervisee on behalf of the client (e.g., assessment reports, workshop training materials), and periodic feedback on the supervisee from consulting clients. Furthermore, the supervisor will role-play and teach appropriate interventions with all clients and will provide de-identified examples from his own practice and experience to guide the supervisee. The supervisee will also assign appropriate readings to enhance the training experience and encourage the supervisee to make optimal use of consultation, outside didactic trainings, and continuing education courses to stay current with I/O psychological knowledge, and all ethical and legal issues as they pertain to the practice of I/O psychology.

Section IX. Functions

The psychological assistant will be providing industrial/ organizational (I/O) psychological services within a non-mental health setting. Specifically, he will function as an I/O consultant to client organizations, helping them to assess, diagnosis and develop interventions for work-related challenges that are of a psychological and/or behavioral nature. The scope of consulting services the psychological assistant will provide includes: (1) psychological assessment of employees for hiring, promotion and development purposes. For each consulting engagement, the psychological assistant will contract and maintain an effective working relationship with, an appointed representative from the client organization (i.e., the primary client). Working in close collaboration with his primary client, the psychological assistant will manage the consulting process – entry/contracting; discovery/data collection; feedback; formulation/implementation of recommended action(s); evaluation and extension or termination of the engagement. Throughout each engagement, he will adhere to legal, regulatory and ethics code guidelines; and provide the client with a written summary of all findings and recommendations.
